Thesis Title	"The Role of Constitutional Institutions and the Political Powers in The Process of American Decision Making"
Year	2005

ending of the bipolar system.

The focus of the power of decision making in the United States is not stable in the sense that, where there is a strong president defending strong and popular issues, he would be forcing the congress and other political institutions to follow him. If the president would not be strong enough, then the congress would take the lead.

The present president of the U.S. has been considered as one of the strongest presidents in American history. He has oriented and affected the process of decision making widely through the ideology he has adopted and believed in. This ideology has come to surface and been effective since the presidency of president Reagan.

Finally, I believe that the process of decision making in the U.S.A. is becoming less democratic and more toward the ruling elite oriented.
