Thesis Title	The United States of America's Attitude toward North Africa region after end of Cold War Geo Strategic Study
Year	2009

Abstract

The subject of thesis regarded as one of the most interested subject, which did not focused by many scientific studies, especially if we know the importance of North Africa region as canter of interests conflict between many Great super powers, especially United States of America. Which decision makers in it's concerning with that is region in 1950s and after that is because crossing of interests among many powers like Union of Soviet, France, and Britain.

The continuity of interesting and influence of North Africa reflects upon the nature of International competition among Great powers, that's make study about that's subject is more crucial, especially if we study the American role in region, which stamped the more important events which happened in region.

So the period that followed the Cold era witness many political, economic, military and, security developments which pointed out the new era in International policy, which United States rise as the unitarily super power in International scene

The United States try to making the suitable policy which harmony with American attitudes towards the North of Africa. Needless to say that the conflict among International powers has been changed after September_11_2001, when the world enter a new epoch known as the war against terrorism.

That's thesis based upon hypothesis concerning with the strategic importance of North Africa region lead the American decision makers to put the North of Africa as great priority as important region for American interests, And also that's importance has been increased after end of cold war.

So that's thesis classified into four chapter: first chapter dealing with Geo_Strategic importance of North Africa region in American attitude, while the second chapter dealing with motivations of American attitudes toward North of Africa, the third chapter dealing with tools which American used its toward North of Africa, in the fourth section concerning with role of competitive powers which can rivalry the movement of United States in that's region.

Thesis depend upon more method to analysis the events and movements of United States and other powers, so the historical approach was useful to know about historical succession of Geo_Strategic concept and defining other concepts which connected with its, while the description method was necessary to describe the Geo_Strategy. The analytical approach was necessary to study the most important motivation of United States toward North of Africa. Needless to say that statistic approach was useful to know the size of American investments, assistances, arms exchange, energy supplies, and demographical development rate in North of Africa.

The most important conclusions of that's thesis dealing with fact that North Africa will not to be as closed region for American interests, indeed that's many other powers like, China, and Russia, can play as competitive powers, and may be turn to axis rivalry United States in region. Thesis concludes that is rivalry may be turn into new Cold War or new International Conflict. In political analysis the competitive among International powers will not stay for long time, May be fall if the accord will be happen among interests of powers, or the conflict will rise and go up if the interests of Great powers will be contradict.
